🌀 From the Bridge

Today Pacific Encounter will spend another full day at sea. During our stay in port you may have noticed the big stars painted across the bow of Pacific Encounter, ever wondered what they were? These stars are actually the Southern cross, a famous constellation that can only be seen in the southern hemisphere. For centuries, mariners have used this constellation to determine the direction of south and navigate the globe. Today on the bridge we still use those same stars to cross check all of our navigational information and make sure we are exactly where we should be.
